United States Sanitary Commission. Collection of 315 printed documents, some with manuscript annotations, and four printed books, as listed below. 1861-67. 10 volumes, uniformly bound in 19th century half black morocco, marbled boards, light rubbing and wear. From the library of William Q. Maxwell (1920-2001), author of Lincoln's Fifth Wheel (1956) a history of the U. S. Sanitary Commission. This collection is cited in the bibliography to Maxwell's work as "Miscellaneous documents. 4 [sic] vols. Formerly belonging to H. W. Bellows. Specially bound." Henry Whitney Bellows (1814-82) organized the U. S. Sanitary Commission and served as its president from its inception in 1861 to its dissolution in 1879. $15,000

A unique collection of source materials on the United States Sanitary Commission, comprising 315 printed documents and four books, all uniformly bound and formerly in the possession of the commission's founder and president, Henry W. Bellows. Many of these pamphlets and broadsides are extremely rare, and a collection of this sort, created by the founder of the commission, is irreplaceable on the market.

The U. S. Sanitary Commission was a civilian organization authorized by the U. S. government to provide medical and sanitary services to the soldiers of the Union Army during the Civil War. The Sanitary Commission grew out of Bellows' association with the Women's Central Association of Relief in New York, one of the numerous soldiers' aid societies established by Northern women in April 1861 after the start of hostilities between the Northern and southern states. Bellows, a Unitarian minister, had helped to organize the WCAR and had written its constitution; he had also observed with dismay how unprepared the U.S. army was to meet even the most basic health care needs of its troops. Recognizing the enormous potential that volunteer aid organizations had for assisting the federal government and military in this area, Bellows led a delegation to Washington, D.C. in May 1861 to petition the government for permission to form a nationwide organization that would assume administrative control of all local and regional soldiers' aid societies in order to coordinate their efforts in the most efficient and useful way possible. Although he at first found few supporters within the government for his proposed organization—Lincoln famously likened it to “a fifth wheel to the coach”—Bellows at last succeeded in obtaining government approval to establish the United States Sanitary Commission, which came into being on June 13, 1861. The Sanitary Commission remained active until February 7, 1879, when Bellows, who had served as its president from its inception, brought the Commission’s affairs to a close.

The U. S. Sanitary Commission consisted of a central office in Washington, D.C. and several semi-independent regional offices; there were even branch offices in London and Paris. While authorized by the government, the U. S. Sanitary Commission received no government funding; instead, it was entirely supported by private donations of cash and supplies. The Sanitary Commission’s duties were manifold: inspecting and reporting on army camp and hospital conditions; collecting and distributing hospital supplies, clothing and food contributed by aid societies; providing field relief to troops on the march and in the battlefield; collecting statistical data on the health and social background of Union army soldiers; improving transportation for the sick and wounded; maintaining a network of soldiers’ homes and convalescent camps; publishing medical and surgical essays on relevant topics for distribution to military medical personnel; and maintaining up-to-date records of all of its activities. After the war the U. S. Sanitary Commission assisted soldiers and their families in obtaining back pay, pensions and other monetary compensation; set up a Historical Bureau to arrange and catalogue its own voluminous records; and made preparations to publish several histories of its war work, including the six-volume Medical and Surgical History of the War of the Rebellion (1870-83). Throughout its existence the Sanitary Commission issued an enormous number of circulars, broadsides, questionnaires, pamphlets and periodical publications, which were of vital importance in maintaining public awareness and support of its work. Over three hundred of these documents are represented here, as can be seen in the list below.

The activities of the U. S. Sanitary Commission had a lasting impact on American medicine, both in war and peace. As stated in a recent history of medicine and surgery in the Civil War,

. . . the Sanitary Commission played a leading role in attending to the overall health needs of Union troops. While also regarding themselves as defenders of the public’s health and welfare, commission members promulgated exacting principles for both camp sanitation and public hygiene. Through its involvement in the political maneuverings to restructure the U.S. Army’s Medical Department, this civilian relief agency would have a decided influence on the daily work experience and professional thinking of tens of thousands of physicians. As a result, it would shape American medicine for decades to come (Rutkow, Bleeding Blue and Gray: Civil War Surgery and the Evolution of American Medicine, p. 17).

This rare broadside, titled “To the Loyal Women of America,” is signed in the text by Abraham Lincoln (at lower right)

First Edition in English, originally published in French in 1867. Evans, an American dentist, settled in France in the late 1840s where he enjoyed an extraordinary success, numbering Napoléon III and members of other important European royal families among his patients, and amassing a large personal fortune. Through his connections with the politically powerful Evans became interested in diplomacy and international philanthropy. During the Crimean, Austro-Prussian-Italian and Franco-Prussian wars he financed the establishment of ambulance corps and other relief facilities for the wounded. The present work documents these services; it also includes an essay on ambulance wagons and a catalogue of Evans' collection of materials used by the U. S. Sanitary Commission. DAB. 33916
